

Restricting access to your organization's data

Third-party application restrictions allow organization admins to restrict an untrusted application's access to the organization's data. Organization members can then use third-party applications for their personal user accounts while keeping organization data safe.

About third-party application restrictions

Organizations can choose which third-party applications have access to their repositories and other resources by enabling third-party application restrictions.

Enabling third-party application restrictions for your organization

Organization admins can enable third-party access restrictions to prevent untrusted applications from accessing the organization's resources while allowing organization members to use third-party applications for their personal accounts.

Disabling third-party application restrictions for your organization

Organization admins can disable restrictions on the third-party applications that have access to the organization's resources.

Approving third-party applications for your organization

When an organization member requests third-party application access to organization resources, organization members with admin access can either approve or deny the request.

Denying access to a previously approved application for your organization

If an organization no longer requires a previously authorized third-party application, admins can remove the application's access to the organization's resources.

Requesting organization approval for third-party applications

Organization members can request that an admin approve access to organization resources for third-party applications.

Article versions

GitHub.com

GitHub Enterprise 2.2

GitHub Enterprise 2.1

GitHub Enterprise 2.0

GitHub Enterprise 11.10.340

Requesting organization approval for your authorized applications

If an organization member has authorized a third-party application to access their own private user data, they can request that an admin approve access for the same application to access organization resources.

 Contact a human

